

SOCIEDAD CIVIL Y DESARROLLO LOCAL

COORDINADORES
ANDRÉS SOLARI VICENTE
ANABEL CRUZ SANTACROCE

INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY FOR THIRD-SECTOR
RESEARCH

EDITORIAL
PORRÚA
MÉXICO

INSTITUTO DE
COMUNICACIÓN
Y DESARROLLO

UNIVERSIDAD
MICHOCANA
DE SAN NICOLÁS
DE HIDALGO

Chiapas Civil Society Organizations:

Cultural Resistance and Economic Alternatives through Fair Trade Cooperatives and International Networks¹

Marco Tavanti, Ph.D. ²

DePaul University Chicago, School of Public Service
International Public Service Graduate Program

Desde el levantamiento Ejército Zapatista de Liberación Nacional (EZLN) el 1º de Janeiro de 1994, el estado de Chiapas se conocen en el mundo por la resistencia indígena contra el neoliberalismo y por su coraje y capacidad organizacional en la promoción del respecto de los derechos y cultural indígena. Lo que meno se conoce de Chiapas son las organizaciones sociales indígenas, en relación a los movimientos de resistencia neo-Zapatistas y en so papel activo en la promoción de economías alternativas y justa. Este ¹ Citation: Tavanti, M. (2007). Chiapas Civil Society Organizations: Cultural Resistance and Economic Alternatives through Fair Trade Cooperatives and International Networks.” In A. S. Vicente and A. C. Santacrose (Eds.), Sociedad Civil y Desarrollo Local (pp. 445-460). Mexico: International Society for the Third Sector (ISTR), Editorial Porrúa, Instituto de Comunicación y Desarrollo, Universidad Michoacana de San Nicolás de Hidalgo.

² Dr. Tavanti has more than eight years of experience working with indigenous civil society organizations in Chiapas, Mexico. He directs the Chiapas Program at DePaul University in Chicago. He is a professor of Global Civil Society Organizations and other graduate courses in the International Public Services Program. He has an extensive experience working with CSOs in Mexico, Brazil, Guatemala and East Africa. He is a native of Italy where he continues to collaborate with European fair trade and developmental NGOs. Among other publications, he is the author of Las Abejas: Pacifist Resistance and Syncretic Identities in a Globalizing Chiapas (Routledge 2003).

artículo presenta los enlaces multicultural de ONGs europeas y de EE.UU con asociaciones civiles como la Sociedad Civil Las Abejas, la Cooperativa Maya Vinic de productores de de café orgánico y certificado en el comercio justo, y la cooperativa de mujeres indígenas como la de Kinal Antzetik. Por medio de una análisis de enlaces internacionales y inter-organizacionales el autor presenta como estas organizaciones indígena Chiapaneca logran de expandir y fortalecer sus capacidad organizacional y sostenibilidad económica. Estos tres ejemplos de organizaciones civiles Chiapanecas indican como las identidades culturales de los movimientos y comunidades indígena, combinadas con una red de solidaridad no-gubernativa internacional, produce nuevas posibilidades de construir sociedades multiculturales fundadas en la democracia, paz, justicia y dignidad.

Since the 1994 rebellion organized by the Zapatista Army of National Liberation (EZLN), Chiapas, Mexico has been well known for indigenous resistance against imposed neoliberal policies and promotion of indigenous rights and cultures. Less known is the critical role that Chiapas-based civil society organizations (CSOs) have within the neozapatista resistance movement and in the creation of sustainable economic alternatives. This paper focuses on the multicultural collaborative dialogues of the civil society Las Abejas (The Bees), the fair trade and organic coffee cooperative Maya Vinic and the women artisan cooperative Kinal Antzetik with European- and United States- based non-profit organizations, universities, and church-based groups. Through a network analysis method, the paper shows how Chiapas CSOs were able to expand pre-existing local networks into new inter-regional and global networks of solidarity. These Chiapas CSOs demonstrate how indigenous identities combined with international solidarity can produce sustainable alternatives to economic globalization and a global civil society founded on democracy and peace with justice and dignity.

The Indigenous Civil Society in the Mexican Context

Civil society organizations, particularly in their form as Asociaciones Civiles (AC) and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have a unique historical significance for Mexico and the southernmost state of Chiapas. Over the past thirty years NGOs have become very important agents for the reformulation of how cultures and economies can either conflict and/or dialogue at the state and national level. Indeed, this change has become even more evident since the 1994 Zapatista uprising. Civil society and Asociaciones políticas are also very important in the Mexican context. They are groups organized to participate in the dissemination of ideas on some aspect of politics. They are very close to NGOs, but they are recognized by the state. Indigenous organizations created important networks of solidarity around Zapatista demands and initiatives such as the 2001 March of the Colors of the Earth and more recently the Other Campaign for the promotion of indigenous rights and culture. Indigenous civil society organizations along with Mexican and international NGOs are fundamental actors for the political and economic transformations of Mexico, and Chiapas in particular. While monitoring, challenging and promoting alternatives to the economic global trends affecting their lives they reformulate new paradigms in the complex relations between the state and civil society.

A number of powerful NGOs emerged during the 1990s and formed with indigenous civil society organizations sympathizing with the political and social demands of the Ejército Zapatista de Liberación Nacional (EZLN, or Zapatista National Liberation Army) in Chiapas. Among these organizations are Alianza Cívica (Civic Alliance, which was supported by the United Nations), the Academia Mexicana de Derechos Humanos (Mexican Academy of Human Rights), Convergencia de Organismos Civiles por la Democracia (Conference of Civil Organizations for Democracy), Acuerdo Nacional por la Democracia (National Accord for Democracy), Movimiento Ciudadano por la Democracia (Citizens' Movement for Democracy), Consejo por la Democracia (Council for Democracy), and the Fundación Arturo Rosenbluth (Arturo Rosenbluth Foundation). Before 1994 these organizations, all formed by citizens, not political parties, played a very important role in denouncing irregularities in political elections. After 1994, their actions and focus aligned with the indigenous struggle for the constitutional recognition of their rights and culture. They also aligned their actions in dialogue with the growing international solidarity of foreign and international NGOs attracted by the messages of Zapatista spokesperson Subcomandante Marcos and by the appeals of solidarity from Chiapas-based Bishop Samuel Ruiz and the FrayBa Human Rights Center.

Because of its geographical and cultural identity, Chiapas is often considered closer to Central America than the rest of Mexico. Yet the Mexican context is very important for Chiapas CSOs that continue to seek recognition from the Mexican government and continue to form coalitions with other Mexican indigenous organizations. Chiapas indigenous civil society organizations sympathizing with the Zapatista demands for autonomy do not seek independence from Mexico. They are proud of their Mexican identity but they cannot deny their even stronger indigenous identity. They seek recognition for their collective and indigenous ways of life. The ongoing Chiapas-Mexico struggle is a positive step in the globalizing process for Mexico and other struggles where indigenous identities seek recognition within national and globally dominant identities and cultures.

NGOs and CSOs in the Chiapas Context

Chiapas is the perfect place for understanding the role of NGOs and CSOs. Over the last 30 years, Chiapas indigenous communities have been forming new organizations promoting social justice, development, human rights, education and women's rights among other important purposes (Frost 2002). These organizations have benefited from collaborating with Mexican and international NGOs. The intensity and presence of NGOs in the Highlands and Lacandón Jungle of Chiapas are recognizable in three periods before Zapatista rebellion in 1994 and after the 2000 presidential elections (Vargas Cetina and Palomo Infante 2002).

The Chiapas context before 1994 was characterized by the efforts of numerous indigenous organizations in the promotion of social justice in their communities, regions and counties. The 1974 Indigenous Congress marks the beginning of radical peasant and indigenous movements in Chiapas. The conference, initially organized to commemorate the sixteenth century champion of indigenous rights, Fray Bartolome de Las Casas, became an organizational genesis for the Tzotzil, Tzeltal, Chol and Tojolabal indigenous communities. Thanks to the prophetic leadership of Bishop Samuel Ruiz, the 1,000 previously trained catechists were instrumental translators and communicators for the preparation, logistics and outcomes of the Congress. Historians and agronomists, among other experts, were invited by the San Cristóbal de Las Casas Diocese to teach courses on Mexican history, agrarian law and economics to indigenous communities and newly formed organizations.

The effects of the Congress were extraordinary as communities were asked to reflect on their socio-economic situations and formulate specific demands to government representatives. It was a grassroots convention designed and prepared by indigenous people themselves. Unlike the government-sponsored indigenous and peasant organizations, the Congress demonstrated the effectiveness of the bottom-up methodology adopted by the progressive Catholic Church in Chiapas. This method of organization, leadership and decision making was employed by most non-governmental and civil society organizations.

In the two decades following the 1974 event, the leadership and methodology of the Catholic Church combined with the indigenous collective wisdom and the pre-existing revolutionary ideologies to form what was later recognized as the EZLN. The relevance of the neo-Zapatistas and of other indigenous organizations became evident in 1992 as more than 10,000 representatives marched in the streets of San Cristóbal de Las Casas, protesting 500 years of oppression of indigenous people.

The presence of NGOs, particularly international NGOs, dramatically increased after the 1994 Zapatista rebellion. As the Mexican government sent heavy military presence to repress the poorly armed Zapatista organization, Bishop Samuel Ruiz and supporters of the Zapatista demands, launched an appeal to the international community to come to Chiapas in defense of indigenous communities and prevent silent massacres and systematic violations of human rights. Chiapas, sharing a border with Guatemala, was very familiar with the brutal side of low-intensity warfare and the effects of military and paramilitary repression on families, communities and organizations. The effective use of media, particularly of electronic mail and the Internet helped prevent Chiapas from replicating the tragedies that occurred in Guatemala during the 1980s. Various Mexican and foreign NGOs came to Chiapas, establishing offices, implementing projects and fostering solidarity with Zapatista organizations and civil society organizations sympathizing with the Zapatista demands. The interests of these organizations spanned from human rights, gender equality, inter-cultural communication, autonomous education and sustainable development. Many NGOs organized delegations, promoting international solidarity, transnational advocacy and exchange of information. Many of these NGOs had an office in Chiapas, most commonly in San Cristóbal de Las Casas, and ran a number of projects, published reports and continued their collaboration with Chiapas indigenous organizations. Human rights observers have been an integral part of their work. Mostly coordinated by Enlace Civil and the Fray Bartolome de Las Casas Human Rights Center, the role of human rights observers has been essential for human rights prevention, documentation and training. DePaul University has been one of the instrumental players in empowering the Fray Bartolome de Las Casas Human Rights Center by delivering effective human rights training to foreign observers and indigenous promoters.

The presence of NGOs in Chiapas began diminishing after the year 2000. Three major political, social and economic factors contributed to these changes. The presidential election of Vicente Fox, of the National Action Party (PAN), marked the end of more than 70 years of domination of the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI). The politics of President Fox slightly changed the previous heavy military confrontation between the Mexican Army and the EZLN. Fox released most of the EZLN political prisoners and eliminated some Mexican Army camps among indigenous communities, but only partially supported the Indigenous Congress's request for the constitutional recognition of indigenous rights and cultures. In his campaign for the promotion of free markets in Mexico, President Fox constantly portrayed the relation with the EZLN as “dialogical” and the conflict in Chiapas as “solved.” In addition to producing confidence in foreign investors, his optimistic portrayals of Chiapas made supporters of international NGOs view Chiapas as less of an international priority than other conflicts around the world.

This optimistic view existed at the state level as well. The election of Pablo Salazar as Governor of Chiapas instilled a sense of hope in Chiapas-based NGOs. Governor Salazar was elected as a candidate of an opposition coalition organized by the leftist Party of the Democratic Revolution (PRD). Numerous NGOs leaders eventually ended up working in state government offices or collaborating on one of their projects.

The work and sustainability of the NGO’s projects became even more complicated as the Zapatista demands were ignored, watered-down and manipulated by complex the political powers. The conflict in Chiapas had become more difficult to discern: Neither the actors nor the context of the struggle were as clearly defined as during the massive deployment of Mexican military power in previous years. Zapatista communities began to show “resistance fatigue.” The EZLN leadership needed to make structural changes to avoid corruption and infiltrations. They formed the caracoles, a de-centralized management form for of EZLN-NGOs relationships (Gonzales and Casanova 2003). Although these changes were necessary steps for the proper administration of autonomous Zapatista communities, they also made the relationships with NGOs more difficult and complicated.

The real battle, however, was fought at the economic level. As the Mexican Red Cross interrupted their aid to the refugee camps of Chiapas and many NGOs redirected their financial assistance to the Middle East or other conflicting regions, the Chiapas- based organizations began facing serious financial problems. In many cases this forced the organizations to change their strategies, close programs or even terminate their presence in Chiapas. Indigenous organizations were also deeply affected by these financial changes. They continued to volunteer for their leadership services while earning very little from their coffee and corn harvests. International presence also diminished in connection to the retirement of the charismatic leadership of Bishop Samuel Ruiz in January 2000. Many ecumenical programs and religious-based initiatives did not continue with the new Church leadership.

In consequence, numerous NGOs diminished their presence and interest in Chiapas. Yet, Chiapas civil society organizations have been a fundamental step in shaping collective action in Central and Latin American civil society. In spite of the disappearance of Chiapas from newspaper headlines, the ideals, courage, methods and context of the indigenous communities continue to shape the development of global civil society (Anheier, Glasius and Kaldor 2005, Baker and Chandler 2005, Chandler 2004).

Civil Society and the Zapatista Movement

On October 12, 1992 numerous Mayan communities prayed and fasted remembering 500 years of indigenous resistance to oppression and slavery. Others joined the anti-Columbus Day march in San Cristóbal de Las Casas. About 9,000 Maya descendant Tzotziles and Tzeltales marched on the streets protesting ethnic discrimination and political marginalization of indigenous people. Many protestors came from the Lacandón Jungle and identified themselves as members of a recently founded radical organization called Alianza Nacional Campesina Independiente Emiliano Zapata (ANCIEZ, of Emiliano Zapata Independent Rural National Alliance) whose members were the majority of protestors and who later joined the EZLN (Ouweeneel 1996). The increasing economic and ethnic marginalization experienced by Tzotziles, Tzeltales, Choles and Tojolabales indigenous communities of Chiapas encouraged mobilization and the search for alternative political programs (Chase 2002).

Political scientist Neil Harvey observes that the neozapatista cry of ¡Ya Basta! (Enough is Enough!) was in fact a call for solidarity for all indigenous people and mestizos tired of economic impositions and cultural discriminations (Harvey 1998). Often overlooked, however, are the rural, indigenous, and women organizations of the Lacandón and Highlands regions of Chiapas that were already forming and raising awareness of these issues in their own communities. The strength of the EZLN rebellion, therefore, lies less in their military resources and revolutionary programs and more in the revelation and coalition of popular discontent of excluded sectors of the Mexican (and international) civil society (Womack 1999).

On June 20, 2005, the leadership of the EZLN, also known as the Comité Clandestino Revolucionario Indígena-Comandancia General (CCRI-CG) surprised the international community by proclaiming a red alert. The comandantes ordered a split with civil society and the retreat of the EZLN representatives from the caracoles.³

³ The caracoles represent a significant step of the EZLN to transition itself and the Zapatista movement from an armed resistance organization into a civil society movement fostering indigenous autonomy and participatory democracy with justice and dignity.

Many have argued that the EZLN, although created and structured as an armed guerrilla organization, has functioned as a catalyst for the growing global civil society movements since the signing of the Cathedral Peace Accord in 1994. National and international NGOs came to Chiapas to express their solidarity with the indigenous communities and prevent military and paramilitary violations of human rights. But they also came to learn the art of resistance to conquest and domination from this remote region and ancient people. The evolution and somehow the shifts in language used in the Declaraciones de La Selva Lacandona shows how the EZLN seeks to promote active civil society participation at the local, national and international level. It also shows how the true face of the Zapatista movement is shaped by the numerous indigenous civil society organizations and by national and international NGOs. Figure 1 illustrates how the Mexican, indigenous and international civil society organizations relate to the EZLN and its leadership.

The Zapatista Movement and Civil Society Organizations

Zapatista autonomous communities usually do not participate in political elections. Some of these bases, as in the case of the case of Polho in the municipality of San Pedro Chenalo, continue their resistance and firm opposition to military and government authorities by remaining in the refugee camp and not returning to their original communities. CSOs, instead, have taken a different stand regarding political participation through the electoral system. Although they are skeptical about political leaders, they also consider active political participation as a positive way to seek societal change.

Indigenous Civil Society Organizations (ICSOs)

Indigenous civil society organizations in Chiapas have been a growing presence in the Mexican, Zapatista and international context. The following three case studies of the civil society Las Abejas, the fair-trade cooperative Maya Vinic and the women cooperative Kinal Ansetik offer a brief but significant overview of the relationship between indigenous identities, organizational capacity and the methods used in collective actions. Although Chiapas-based CSOs vary in their operational focuses, cultural identities and organizational missions, they all reflect some common lessons due to their history, shared passion and persistent struggle.

The Civil Society Las Abejas

The Sociedad Civil Las Abejas emerged in 1992 as a collective response to land conflict and political injustice. Numerous representatives from 22 communities gathered in Tzajalchen, in the municipality of Chenalhó and formed a coalition to defend a woman's right to own land. Las Abejas formed when Chenalhó resident Agustín Hernandez Lopez declared that he did not want to share 120 hectares of inherited land with his two sisters, Catarina and Maria. His argument was that "as women" they did not have any rights to land (Tavanti 2003, Hidalgo 1998). As is typical with disagreements in this indigenous community, local residents gathered to examine the quarrel. The Tzanembolom community decided to divide the land into three equal parts, giving justice and equal rights to all the siblings. The brother, in disagreement with the community decision organized an armed group, kidnapped his two sisters and their families and began assaulting the coalition supporting his sisters' rights. Eventually, six innocent indigenous representatives of this coalition were unjustly arrested by the police. In the face of such injustice, indigenous representatives mobilized their communities and went marching and protesting at the Cereso Jails in San Cristóbal de Las Casas. Thinking about a name for this newly organized group, they chose the image of Abejas (bees) to symbolize their collective identity and actions directed toward the defense of the rights of the little ones and toward sharing the fruit of their work equally with everyone (Tavanti 2003).

Las Abejas is a civil society that, similar to numerous other indigenous organizations, emerged from the Catholic Church's social work and from political movements (Cleary and Steigenga 2004). About 90 percent of the members of Las Abejas identify themselves with the progressive side of the Catholic Church. Now emeritus, Bishop Samuel Ruiz Garcia with his 40 years of work among the indigenous communities of Chiapas is the leader that best characterizes the Church's role in promoting social movements and indigenous organizations. Inspired by the liberation theologies of the 1960s and 1970s, Bishop Ruiz promoted a pastorale geared toward the eradication of social, political, economic, but also cultural and religious forms of oppression against indigenous populations. Tatik Samuel, or "father", as the Maya descendants of Chiapas prefer to call him, followed the teachings of 16th century indigenous rights defender Fray Bartolome de Las Casas. The events surrounding the 1974 Indigenous Congress, commemorating the historical figure of Fray Bartolome, gave the opportunity to indigenous communities to refocus on their identity, their rights, their dignity, and most of all their ability to organize and resist oppression. Las Abejas as an organization most clearly reflects not only the search for identity, but also the recovery of their right to have an identity. Its constitution resulted from numerous opportunities created among Tzotzil-Christian communities as the diocese began respecting indigenous cultures, expansion of the role of the laity and promoting a less hierarchical church.

By convening indigenous people from different parts of Chiapas, with different languages, customs and traditions, the 1974 Indigenous Congress encouraged the formation of bridges of dialogue across diverse social contexts and cultural identities. Similar problems and common needs for change were recognized to be the main concerns of Tzotzil, Tzeltal, Chol, Tojolabal, Zoque and Lacandón people. The sharing of local struggles helped to establish channels of ongoing communication and to form coalitions for collective resistance. Also, the Congress gave the non-Indian people of Chiapas and Mexico irrefutable proof that indigenous communities are able to organize, share awareness and find unity even across language, ethnic and cultural differences. Clearly, the indigenous experience of analyzing their situations and expressing focused demands laid the groundwork for the creation of communication networks and community mobilization later recognized in the Las Abejas and EZLN organizations. In the aftermath of the Congress, numerous indigenous organizations emerged representing the same basic demands for land, education, health services, work and just commerce (Benjamin 1996).

Las Abejas sympathizes with the EZLN, supporting the Zapatista demands for indigenous rights and culture, but distinguish themselves on the basis of Christian-based nonviolent resistance. Over the past few years, international attention on the Zapatista struggle and indigenous organizations has dwindled; however, the Zapatista movement is very active through its various organizational expressions of local activism and global networks. They continue to organize resistance in their communities and the international human rights observers maintain their presence and support. The relevance of the Zapatista movement is best understood through the inherent relationship between the EZLN rebellion, the Las Abejas resistance and the intensifying networks with national and international nongovernmental organizations. Although Las Abejas is a small indigenous organization, it represents the indigenous oppositional movement rooted in 510 years of experience in resistance. In addition, Las Abejas characterizes the growing relevance of civil society at local, regional and global levels.

The Fair-Trade Coffee Cooperative Maya Vinic

While in the refugee camps of Chenalhó, Las Abejas wanted to harvest their coffee in spite of the threats of armed paramilitary groups, mostly anti-Zapatistas and PRI sympathizers. Thanks to presence of numerous Mexican and international human rights observers coordinated by the Fray Bartolome de Las Casas Human Rights Center, members of Las Abejas succeeded in accessing their cafetales and peacefully harvesting their coffee. As they returned home with their coffee beans, however, they experienced another threat: the economic threat of the low coffee prices and the ongoing exploitation of coyotes, or mediators in the commercialization of green coffee.

In 1999 Las Abejas decided to form a cooperative of coffee producers. The cooperative addressed two important problems individual producers faced with the coyotes: illiteracy and storage problems. The coyotes manipulated the weight and payment of coffee to individual producers and profited from the lack of storage capacity. The cooperative soon became a visible sign of hope, not only for Las Abejas but for numerous other indigenous coffee producers who needed the benefits and organization of civil society. Pre-existing coffee cooperatives like Majomut or Mut Vitz were controlled by members of the PRI party or Zapatistas. The Highlands of Chiapas needed a cooperative that would welcome representatives of civil society organizations. However, Maya Vinic does not consider itself a “politically neutral” organization. Their members and leaders believe that the Chiapas struggle for economic sustainability and cultural resistance passes through to the operation of a coffee cooperative. And yet, they are inclusive in their membership and maintain a dialogue with coffee cooperatives and producers outside of Chiapas.

On December 11, 2001, Las Abejas received the prestigious Human Rights Award of the French Republic. The recognition, presented by French Prime Minister Lionel Jospin to Las Abejas' representatives in Paris, was directed to the organization for their work in defense of the cultural identity of the indigenous people of Mexico. They recognized Las Abejas' women for their courageous works of resistance for the construction of peace with justice and dignity. But most of all, Las Abejas received this award for their courage to create Maya Vinic in the aftermath of the Acteal massacre. In a climate of violence, tension and grief for the massacre of 45 innocent indigenous women, children and men murdered by Mexican paramilitary groups in December 1997, Las Abejas did not respond to violence with violence. They did not choose to adopt a resistance strategy of isolation. Instead they built on the international networks acquired after the massacre and began expanding their networks for selling coffee and becoming more sustainable. There is speculation that the Acteal massacre was planned in December to interfere with the coffee harvest. Many paramilitaries and PRI supporters benefited both economically and politically, at the cost of the Abejas members who were too terrified to go out and harvest their coffee that year. The creation of the Maya Vinic cooperative was an attempt to channel their products toward alternative markets such as those of fair trade and organic products.

Fair prices are a fundamental principle in the Fair-trade alternative. Yet, the other six principles monitored and promoted by the German-based Fair-trade Labeling Organization International (FLO) guarantee that cooperatives work toward economic and social sustainability. According to the Maya Vinic president, the cooperative gives people the opportunity to maintain their cultural identity by doing what they have always done and to make a living by doing it. The cooperative clearly benefits economic sustainability for indigenous communities and Chiapas CSOs that would not have the means necessary to survive.

Members of Maya Vinic know that the real struggle in Chiapas is more than ever an economic struggle linked to their rights to cultivate their lands and sell their products at a fair price. However, a fair trade-certified coffee is not a guarantee that their coffee will sell. Maya Vinic accelerated its process of certification thanks to the already existing network with fair trade importers and roasters from Europe and the United States. Organizations such as Higher Grounds, Pistol and Burner, Arabejas, JEM, Just Coffee, Larry's Beans and ChiapanECHO have aligned themselves with the work of TransFair, Global Exchange and Equal Exchange to promote consumer education through the selling of Maya Vinic fair trade and organic coffee.

Artisan Women Cooperatives: Maya and Kinal Antzetik

Women are at the forefront of efforts to build economic opportunities for indigenous communities and civil society organizations (Eber and Kovic 2003). Weaving cooperative run and organized entirely by Mayan women are now a common reality in Chiapas. Traditional indigenous cultures do not consider women as entrepreneurs. Their role is primarily related to the maintenance of the household and the childcare. Yet, Chiapas women have been gaining much more respect and authority in their communities. In Acteal, a person like Maria Vazques symbolizes these changes. In spite of being a single mother, Maria is a highly respected survivor of the Acteal massacre and an active leader in civil society Las Abejas. The Maya Vinic cooperative, whose elected leadership is predominantly male, is pressured by the international community to promote their process of women emancipation and active participation in the decision-making process. The progressive Catholic Church, with its liberating pastoral approaches, has highly contributed to this process of gender empowerment throughout Chiapas indigenous communities.

For the last ten years, indigenous women of the Highlands of Chiapas established several networks of collaboration with national and international NGOs, universities, churches and began creating their own organizations. Within organizations such as J'pas Jolovetik, the Organization of Artisan Women in the Highlands, the Coordinadora Diocesana de Mujeres (CODEMU), the Christian Base Communities (CEBs) of the Diocese and numerous cooperatives of weavers and bakers often supported by the Coordinating Committee for Peace (CONPAZ), women have worked on questions of reproductive health, human and indigenous rights, against sexual violence and for the promotion of women's dignity. Their voices were finally heard in their communities and together they achieved important solutions for the prevention and denunciation of domestic violence. As organized groups, women were able to demand the respect of their gender rights along with economic, political, and ethnic rights.

K'inal Antzetik, which means "Women's Earth" in Tzeltal, began in 1991 when a group of indigenous women weavers came together to try to increase their income by pooling their skills and marketing strategies. K'inal Antzetik, like Maya Antzetik and other Chiapas-based women artisan cooperatives, is developing its internal organizational strengths along with expanding their international recognition within the fair-trade networks and international women's movement (Rovira 2000).

Since then, K'inal Antzetik has expanded from its initial focus on technical support for community cooperatives. K'inal Antzetik's work now includes trainings on sexual health and reproductive rights, education and literacy programs and leadership development for women. Their collective and cooperative artisanal work support their efforts to organize and defend their communities while gaining access to health care.

One of K'inal Antzetik's largest projects is a weaving cooperative in San Cristóbal de las Casas. Formed in 1996 in the face of rising military violence, sharply declining wages, rising costs of living and intensifying economic and political exploitation of indigenous peoples, the Jolom Mayaetik (Mayan weavers, in Tzeltal) weaving cooperative focuses on economic and political autonomy for indigenous women. Like other Chiapas-based women cooperatives, K'inal provides its 350 members with economic and educational opportunities as part of creating local alternatives to the dominant neo-liberal economic model (Grimes and Milgram 2000).

K'inal Antzetik also runs several other cooperatives, including sewing, shoe-making and carpentry collectives. And, as part of a food-security initiative called Seeds of Hope, K'inal is helping women operate a bakery. The aim of K'inal is to develop economic autonomy at the community level and improve women's ability to feed their families. This project aims to provide a reliable source of food, as well as income, for local families. The project includes distributing animals and vegetable seeds to families in the community and providing trainings on animal management, seed cultivation and organic gardening.

The defense for human and indigneous rights in Chiapas clearly passes through the rights of indigenous women within their communities. K'inal, similar to other Chiapas-based women's organizations, offers ongoing workshops on women's health and reproductive rights. Recently, K'inal completed a report on maternal mortality in indigenous communities, addressing issues of pregnancy and childbirth, along with compiled data and testimonies from women in Chiapas. K'inal also pays a critical role in the network of CSOs demanding equitable distribution of resources and respect for the collective rights of indigenous peoples in Mexico.

Conclusion: Chiapas Lessons

The political and social participation of Chiapas CSOs are closely tied to cultures, organizations and network capacities. This brief overview of Chiapas CSOs illustrates how indigenous collective identities are the core of political and economic organizational capacity. Collective identities along with collective actions of resistance are also the essential factors for building effective solidarity networks across the globe. The civil society Las Abejas, the coffee cooperative Maya Vinic and the women cooperative K'inal Antzetik are three examples of how Chiapas CSOs perform effectively when an alignment of four factors: cultural identities; organizational capacity; sustainable economies; and glocal (global and local) networks occurs.

First, indigenous cultures are essential in Chiapas and need to be recognized as such. Chiapas CSOs center their collective identities and actions into their own collective cultures. The more they are identified with their own cultural identity and indigenous rights, the more they can sustain local and international coalitions.

Second, Chiapas CSOs need to continue their close relations with more structurally-organized Mexican and international NGOs. They need to build their organizational capacities, managerial responsibilities and political awareness through the accompaniment of NGOs.

Third, Chiapas CSOs need to focus their energies into the formulation of effective strategies for economic sustainability. Their search for autonomy needs to be strengthened by their resistance to global, regional and local exploitations and by the promotion of alternative economic opportunities. Fair trade, organic productions and culturally-driven initiatives appear to be an appropriate avenue toward sustainability.

Fourth, Chiapas CSOs must maintain and strengthen their inter-organizational and international relations. Their ability to dialogue with various governmental, for-profit and non-governmental sectors both at the local and global level is crucial for achieving peaceful and democratic social change with justice and dignity. They need to maintain their voice heard in the international community by intensifying exchange opportunities to and from Chiapas.

The organizational, social and cultural identities of these Chiapas CSOs encourage them to seek cross-cultural recognition, international solidarity and global action. Their collective identities clearly play an important role in re-shaping their collective actions of resistance and their active role in building sustainable alternatives of development through the formation and maintenance of international networks of solidarity. Las Abejas, Maya Vinic and Kinal Antzetik are three case studies that best describe the innovative ways that Chiapas CSOs have for transforming indigenous identities into international actions seeking democracy and peace with justice and dignity.

References

- Anheier, H., Glasius, M. and Kaldor, M. (eds) 2005, Global Civil Society 2004/5, Sage, London.
- Baker, G. and Chandler, D. 2005, Global Civil Society: Contested Futures. Routledge, New York.
- Benjamin, T. 1996. A Rich Lland, a Poor People: Politics and Society in Modern Chiapas. University of New Mexico Press. Albuquerque.
- Chandler, D. 2004. Constructing Global Civil Society: Morality and Power in International Relations. Palgrave Macmillan, New York.
- Chase, J. 2002. The Spaces of Neoliberalism: Land, Place and Family in Latin America. Kumarian Press, Bloomfield, CT.
- Clarence-Smith, W. G., and Topik, S. 2003. The Global Coffee Economy in Africa, Asia and Latin America, 1500-1989. Cambridge University Press, Cambridge.
- Cleary, E. L., and Steigenga, T. J. 2004. Resurgent Voices in Latin America: Indigenous Peoples, Political Mobilization, and Religious Change. Rutgers University Press, Brunswick, N.J.
- Collier, G. A. and Lowery Quaratiello, E. 1999. Basta!: Land and the Zapatista Rebellion in Chiapas. Food First Books, Oakland, Calif.
- Eber, C. E. and Kovic, C.M. 2003. Women of Chiapas: Making History in Times of Struggle and Hope, Routledge, New York.
- Eckstein, S. and Wickham-Crowley, T. P. 2003. What Justice? Whose Justice?: Fighting for Fairness in Latin America. University of California Press, Berkeley.
- Edwards, M. and Gaventa, J. (eds) 2001. Global Citizen Action. Boulder, Lynne Rienner Publishers, Boulder.
- Eversole, R. H. 2003. Here to Help: Ngos Combating Poverty in Latin America. M.E. Sharpe, Armonk, N.Y.
- Farmer, P. 2003. Pathologies of Power: Health, Human Rights, and the New War on the Poor California Series in Public Anthropology, 4. University of California Press, Berkeley.
- Fernández, D. 1995. Los Derechos Humanos En México Durante La Transición Sexenal. 1a. ed. México, D.F.: Universidad Iberoamericana Biblioteca Francisco Xavier Clavigero Centro de Información Académica: Centro de Derechos Humanos Miguel Agustín Pro Juárez.
- Fisher, W. F. and Ponniah, T. 2003. Another World Is Possible: Popular Alternatives to Globalization at the World Social Forum. Palgrave, New York.
- Frost, M. 2002, Constituting Human Rights: Global Civil Society and the Society of Democratic States. Routledge, New York.
- González Casanova, P. 26 September 2003. "Los caracoles Zapatistas, redes de resistencia y autonomía." La Jornada, D.F., Mexico.

- Gossen, G. H. and Portilla, M.L. 1993. South and meso-american native spirituality: from the cult of the feathered serpent to the theology of liberation, World Spirituality; V. 4.
- Grimes, K.M., and Milgram, B.L. 2000, Artisans and Cooperatives: Developing Alternate Trade for the Global Economy, University of Arizona Press, Tucson.
- Gwynne, R. N., and Cristóbal, K. 2004, Latin America Transformed: Globalization and Modernity. 2nd ed. Oxford University Press, London.
- Harvey, N.1998. The Chiapas Rebellion: The Struggle for Land and Democracy, Duke University Press, Durham.
- Hernández C. and Aída, R. 1998, La Otra Palabra: Mujeres Y Violencia En Chiapas, Antes Y Después De Acteal. Centro de Investigación y Acción para la Mujer, Mexico.
- Hidalgo, O. 1998, El Vuelo de Las Abejas. In Acteal, Una Herida Abierta, edited by I. T. y. d. E. S. d. Occidente. Tlaquepaque, Jalisco, Mexico City: ITESO.
- Holloway, J. and Peláez, E. 1998, Zapatista!: Reinventing Revolution in Mexico, Pluto Press, London.
- Marcos and Juana Ponce de Leon. 2001, Our Word Is Our Weapon: Selected Writings. Seven Stories Press, New York.
- McCleary, R. M. 1992, Seeking Justice: Ethics and International Affairs Case Studies in International Affairs, Westview Press, Boulder, Colo.
- Molyneux, M., Shahrashoub Razavi, and United Nations Research Institute for Social Development, 2002, Gender Justice, Development, and Rights Oxford Studies in Democratization, Oxford University Press, New York.
- Monroy, M. B. 1994, Pensar Chiapas, Repensar México: Reflexiones De Las ONGs Mexicanas Sobre El Conflicto, Convergencia de Organismos Civiles por la Democracia, Mexico.
- Nash, J. C. 2001, Mayan Visions: The Quest for Autonomy in an Age of Globalization, Routledge, New York.
- Ouweneel, A. 1996, Away from Praying Eyes: The Zapatista Revolt of 1994. In Indigenous Revolts in Chiapas and the Andean Highland, edited by K. Gosner and A. Ouweneel. Amsterdam: CEDLA.
- Rovira, G. 2002, Women of Maize: Indigenous Women and the Zapatista Rebellion, Latin America Bureau, London.
- Stephen, L. 2002, Zapata Lives!: Histories and Cultural Politics in Southern Mexico, University of California Press, Berkeley.
- Tavanti, Marco. 2003, Las Abejas: Pacifist Resistance and Syncretic Identities in a Globalizing Chiapas Religion in History, Society & Culture, Routledge, New York.
- Vargas Cetina, Gabriela, and María Dolores Palomo Infante. De Lo Privado a Lo Público: Organizaciones En Chiapas. 1. ed. México: CIESAS [Centro de

- Investigaciones y Estudios Superiores en Antropología Social]: Miguel Angel Porrúa Grupo Editorial, 2002.
- Vinding, Diana, and International Work Group for Indigenous Affairs. Indigenous Women: The Right to a Voice Iwgia Document, No. 88. Copenhagen: Iwgia, 1998.
- Womack, John. Rebellion in Chiapas: An Historical Reader. New York: New Press; Distributed by W.W. Norton & Company Inc., 1999.
- Yúdice, George. The Expediency of Culture: Uses of Culture in the Global Era Post-Contemporary Interventions. Durham: Duke University Press, 2003.